A second presentation focused on how the model for DODs health care benefit delivery system could be adapted to meet the data-sharing needs of benefit programs. According to William Boggess, an official with the DMDC, the DOD system provides a broad range of information on the 23 million beneficiaries of the military health care system. The system consists of a central computer system containing identifying information on beneficiaries linked to a network of satellite computer systems containing databases of other information about the beneficiaries, including medical, dental, immunization, and pharmaceutical records; benefit entitlement; and security clearances, among others. With this network of databases, Mr. Boggess said that DOD is able to respond, on average, within 4 seconds to over a million information requests each day from more than 1, 400 locations in 13 countries. Mr. Boggess then described how government agencies might improve their payment accuracy and program integrity if they created a nationwide network of benefit programs based on the DOD approach. A central database containing identifying information about the individual could be linked to the computer systems used by such programs as TANF, Food Stamps, SSI, Medicaid, and Medicare. Each agency could access the information it needed from any of the databases in the network, and each agency would have responsibility for maintaining the data in its own database. If agencies shared their data in this manner, individuals applying for or receiving benefits from multiple agencies could provide much of the information that these agencies needed only one time, to one agency. In addition, access to the databases of other agencies would make...
