Not illustrated. 1985 Excerpt: . . . to yield estimates of the probability of dying from birth to the conventional ages 1, 2, 3, 5, 10, and 20. These values also provide a basis for estimating the reference point for each of the estimated $t(x)$ parameters assuming that mortality has been constant or has declined in a linear fashion (cf. Feeney, 1980). Subsequently, a variety of modifications to and extensions of the basic method have been proposed. Sullivan (1972) and Trussell (1975) have developed alternative sets of adjustment multipliers to increase the flexibility of the method under differing fertility conditions. Extensions of the basic method include the development of a duration of marriage-based version of the Brass age model, the application of the basic method to data from two surveys to obtain an estimate of inter-survey child mortality, and a variant in which the fertility experiences of true cohorts are used to adjust the model-based adjustment multipliers used in the basic version of the method. Recently, a method based upon data collected from women attending a medicalhealth center to bear a child regarding the survival of the previous child has been tested in several Latin American countries (see Pujol, 1985). This method uses information which can be quickly and inexpensively collected to provide an estimate of child mortality between the birth of the previous child and the date of birth of the newborn child (an average duration of about 30 months in high fertility societies). Several approaches have been developed for the indirect estimation of adult mortality. One...
