Both were in imminent peril of being sent to the Tower, in company, on the last day of June, for infringing on the sanctities of the palace. Twelve days afterwards, Grey was sent thither for his alleged design to seize the Sovereign, and to dictate to him, at the head of armed men, conditions of government, --just as Essex would fain have done to Elizabeth two years earlier. The original design for surprising the Court at Greenwich on the night of midsummer day appears to have been abandoned, in favour of another scheme for laying an ambush for the King, on his leaving Hanworth upon some later day. The depositions, when they are collated, are found to present a mere imbroglio of confusion, as to the most material points. Part of this obscurity may doubtless be ascribed to that muddleheadedness which seems to be an ingredient in political conspiracy, the absence of which is as rare as the absence of subornation. Part, it is certain, must be ascribed to the official industry subsequently expended on the preparation, or concoction, of the documents themselves. It is only with much hesitation, therefore, that an epitome of what had passed between Lord Grey and his Romanist confederates can here be given. But the reader, by turning to Appendix vi., will be able to check the narrative with its new evidence. Intrinsically, that intercourse bore no real relation to the proceedings even of Cobham,...
